FOREWORD

BY

MALCOLM WATSON.

TO-NIGHT we celebrate the second anniversary of "The Maid of the Mountains," an event of which every one concerned for the well-being of the English stage has good reason to be proud. Art, it has been said, has no nationality. If by that be meant that a thing of beauty is a gift from the gods to all capable of appreciating it, the statement may pass unchallenged. On the other hand, no nation can neglect to cultivate and develop its individual artistic impulses without imperilling its foothold in the scheme of existence. The terrible experiences of the last four years have shown the urgent need of making Great Britain self-supporting. To apply this principle to Drama, Music, or Painting may not be either possible or advisable. None the less, these experiences teach the obvious lesson that both loyalty and self-interest demand that preference in these fields shall always be given, other things being equal, to works of native rather than of alien growth.

That the claim can be justified no less on commercial than on artistic grounds, the signal success of "The Maid of the Mountains" conclusively proves. From first to last it has nobly resisted all temptations to belong to other nations; it is British-born and British-owned. A happier association than that formed by Mr. Frederick Lonsdale as "Onlie Begetter" of the book, and Captain Fraser-Simson as composer, you shall not easily find. Over them hovers Mr. Robert Evett as the proud godfather of their merry and melodious bantling. Nor must mention be omitted of Mr. Oscar Asche, whose part in the birth of the infant I leave to your own imaginings. The outcome of their labours, coupled with the singing and acting of a brilliant company headed by Miss José Collins, is a triumph eclipsing that of any musical play, native or foreign, previously produced at Daly's. Do not think me over-boastful of what has been accomplished; but, frankly, I can discover no reason why we should not congratulate ourselves, openly and unhesitatingly, upon so splendid an achievement.

There remains one important point to be touched upon before we quit the subject. I refer to the part played by the public, without whose enthusiastic support and unwavering encouragement all else would have been in vain. Fortunately, in their case, virtue is its own—and a most plentiful —reward.

"The Maid of the Mountains," I firmly believe, has still a wealth of happy days in store. There are, assuredly, many rungs to be overtaken on the ladder of fame ere either she or we, the spectators of her giddy ascent, shall weary of an adventure that has brought us both so many hours of unalloyed delight. Upon the banner she bears aloft is inscribed the word "Excelsior!" To-morrow she begins a fresh flight, taking with her the hearty goodwill and earnest wishes of countless friends and admirers for even greater successes.
